Most virus infections today are the result of two main types of threats: Windows viruses and rootkits. There are many varieties of Windows viruses, and some of the most notorious include the Win32.Jad, Win32.Lavas, Win32.Downad, Win32.Foob, and Win32.Love. Rootkits are a different type of threat that remain hidden from the user and can completely modify a machine's system in order to do things like steal personal information or prevent users from logging on to the computer. Rootkits are especially dangerous because they are designed to remain stealthy, and only get activated when the user does something that accidentally triggers their presence on the computer. Most rootkits are able to do things like block access to startup items, hide files on the desktop, modify search paths, and even track keystrokes, clipboard activity, and more. Understanding and dealing with both types of threat is vital to keeping your PC free of viruses, malware, and rootkits. This course provides a thorough overview of each of these threats, how they are spread, and how to deal with them. How to install EPROMs on the Arduino using RedBoot?
